Dr. Simon Biattels of the department's bureau of preventable diseases was placed in charge of a field force of physicians, nurses and inspectors who are to operate in the infected districts. All efforts now being made are for the purpose of convincing house-holders of the importance of precautions. These include sunlight and clean surroundings, with care that children should not be permitted to go anywhere near the infected districts, approach any person from an infected nome or play with strange children at any time. The carrier of infantile paralysis makes the disease dangerous. Its period of incubation after infection runs from three to ten days and during that period a child on the street may infect many
